The boy in the book is unnamed, but he serves as a kind of everychild, representing the experiences and perspectives of all children who live in cities. He is full of wonder and curiosity, and he sees the city as a place of endless possibilities. But he also sees the city's darker side, including the poverty, crime, and pollution that can make it a difficult place to live.

Despite the challenges, the boy ultimately finds hope and beauty in the city. He learns to appreciate the diversity of people and cultures that make up the city, and he finds solace in the small moments of joy that can be found even in the most difficult circumstances.
