

The Man Who Invented the Wild West

William F. Cody was born in Iowa in 1846, and he grew up on the frontier. He was a natural showman, and he quickly learned how to entertain an audience. In 1869, he joined the Pony Express, and he soon became one of the most famous riders in the West. After the Pony Express went out of business, Cody went on to become a buffalo hunter. He killed thousands of buffalo, and he played a major role in the near-extinction of the American buffalo.
